To give retail clients financial product advice, you need to provide a Financial Services Guide (FSG) that outlines the services offered, how they operate, payment methods, and conflict of interest disclosures. This guide aims to ensure clients receive good-quality advice by providing enough information for informed decisions. Regulatory Guide 175 Licensing: Financial Product Advisers explains what is required for FSGs, including content, remuneration, and record-keeping obligations. When dealing with potential financial advisers, it's essential to get a written FSG from each person on your list before discussing services. The FSG should explain the adviser's: 1. Licensing status 2. Customer complaint handling procedures 3. Offered products and services 4. Payment methods 5. Associations or relationships that could influence their advice Five key facts to check in a financial services guide are: 1. Is the adviser licensed by a licence holder or has an authority to represent them? 2. How does the adviser handle customer complaints? 3. What products do they offer, and can they prepare an investment plan for you? 4. How is the adviser paid, including any commissions? 5. Does the adviser work for or have links with a financial institution? By understanding these facts, clients can make informed decisions about seeking financial advice. FSGs are crucial in Australia's consumer protection puzzle, especially with updated regulations and a focus on transparency. Transparency in robo-advisers: a shield against predatory practices
