The term "controlled" means "involving little problem or effort." Therefore, convenience products refer to what they require little problem or effort to buy. They are easy to access and purchased frequently. Examples include: food, beverages, laundry detergent, toiletries, deodorant and toothpaste. These goods are easily available from the local supermarket and consumers buy them daily, weekly or monthly. Because they are known as convenient products. These products that are often purchased are classified as "successful products because there is little effort to buy them. For example, you can have a favorite type of cereals that you buy every week. You go straight to the cereal corridor and take without thinking. This is convenient, because you do not spend half an hour debating if you prefer coconut-pops or cheerios. The main characteristics of convenience products include: frequently purchased relatively low prices of non-long purchasing shopping à €
