I have not read a single article of what this teacher has posted. In this specific example, I am speaking of a conversation at a conference. When sfidÃ² them verbally, the reflexive response was that I was racist to suggest that it was wrong. When I challenged them in writing, the reflexive response has been to provide an article that does not really supportÃ² their opinion, and used the term "European colonialism" rather than "European." "Europees" is not the same as "European colonialism." Refusing to accept this basic distinction, which was failing to accept their inclinations prejudicial and racist. This teacher has happened to someone who agreed with some of the basic premises of the "legacy iceman". (Https://www.amazon.com.au/iceman-ineitance-prehistoric-sources-aggression / dp / 1879831007) ... in a conversation where people talk about "us" and "people" fall almost always in fundamental theory traps mis-attribution. For me, I do not believe that "Africans" are bad because the © ensolato it started there, and continues to this day. Nor because © © mistreat albinos. © Nor for things like trade in slaves barbery ... humans are much more complicated of the categories with which we use, so conversations and polizies explicitly based on the identity of the group seem to have a very hard time to fall off a cliff. In this sense, my dilemma is, what can you say to someone who really believes in that are highly anti-racist while they think they are fully justified in their racism (eg "Europeans are the source of dominance, slavery and hegemony in world" )? I think things like the legacy of the texts belong to the same container as Mein Kampf. ... So, if the point of these activist agendas is to provoke a conversation, it's fantastic. But if the conversation can not proceed beyond the simplistic categories and narrow lens, then there will be very well from the conversation. Although, perhaps for those with orders of the anti-establishment day who want to create disunity and chaos, that's not a bad thing ... There are a large number of books on this subject, but writers tend to cover the topic defunendo that despite the atrocities and racism brought to this world from the Caucasian race, have given the world some order, some technologies and letters and letters of lasting benefits. What the authors of these books do not take into account despite the contributions that benefit the world, Europeans in their quest for world domination have created a disastrous climate for the world's people.
